I've started reading The Hobbit and found it absolutely confusing. At a few points the text describes a creature as "standing on his leg", which it later says "stood on [his] leg". In this context is the "on" a punctuation mark or a dot? How would I write it so that the reader knows? A: In your example, the "on" is a preposition and not part of a punctuation mark. If a word is repeated multiple times in the same sentence, you can use the comma to show the separation of the words. "The evil beasts stood on their legs, ready to leap!" ce6e30c18e

Can the development of the right and left caudate be assessed by neuropsychological tests? In this study we aimed to test the hypothesis that the intra-individual differences in performance of the right and left caudate nuclei can be quantitatively assessed by neuropsychological tests. A series of 44 right-handed healthy individuals and a series of 16 stroke patients with lesions in the left caudate nucleus were compared for verbal fluency, digit span, digit symbol coding, letter fluency, verbal comprehension, and processing speed. A factor analysis revealed two neuropsychological factors which correlated with the left and right caudate nucleus. These factors are theoretically relevant to assess the right and left caudate nucleus. However, in this study the neuropsychological factors did not correlate with the volumes of the right and left caudate nucleus. On the other hand, our data demonstrated that the neuropsychological performance can be used as a clinical marker for the caudate nucleus in stroke patients.Q: Powershell: How do I combine the lines of an array?
